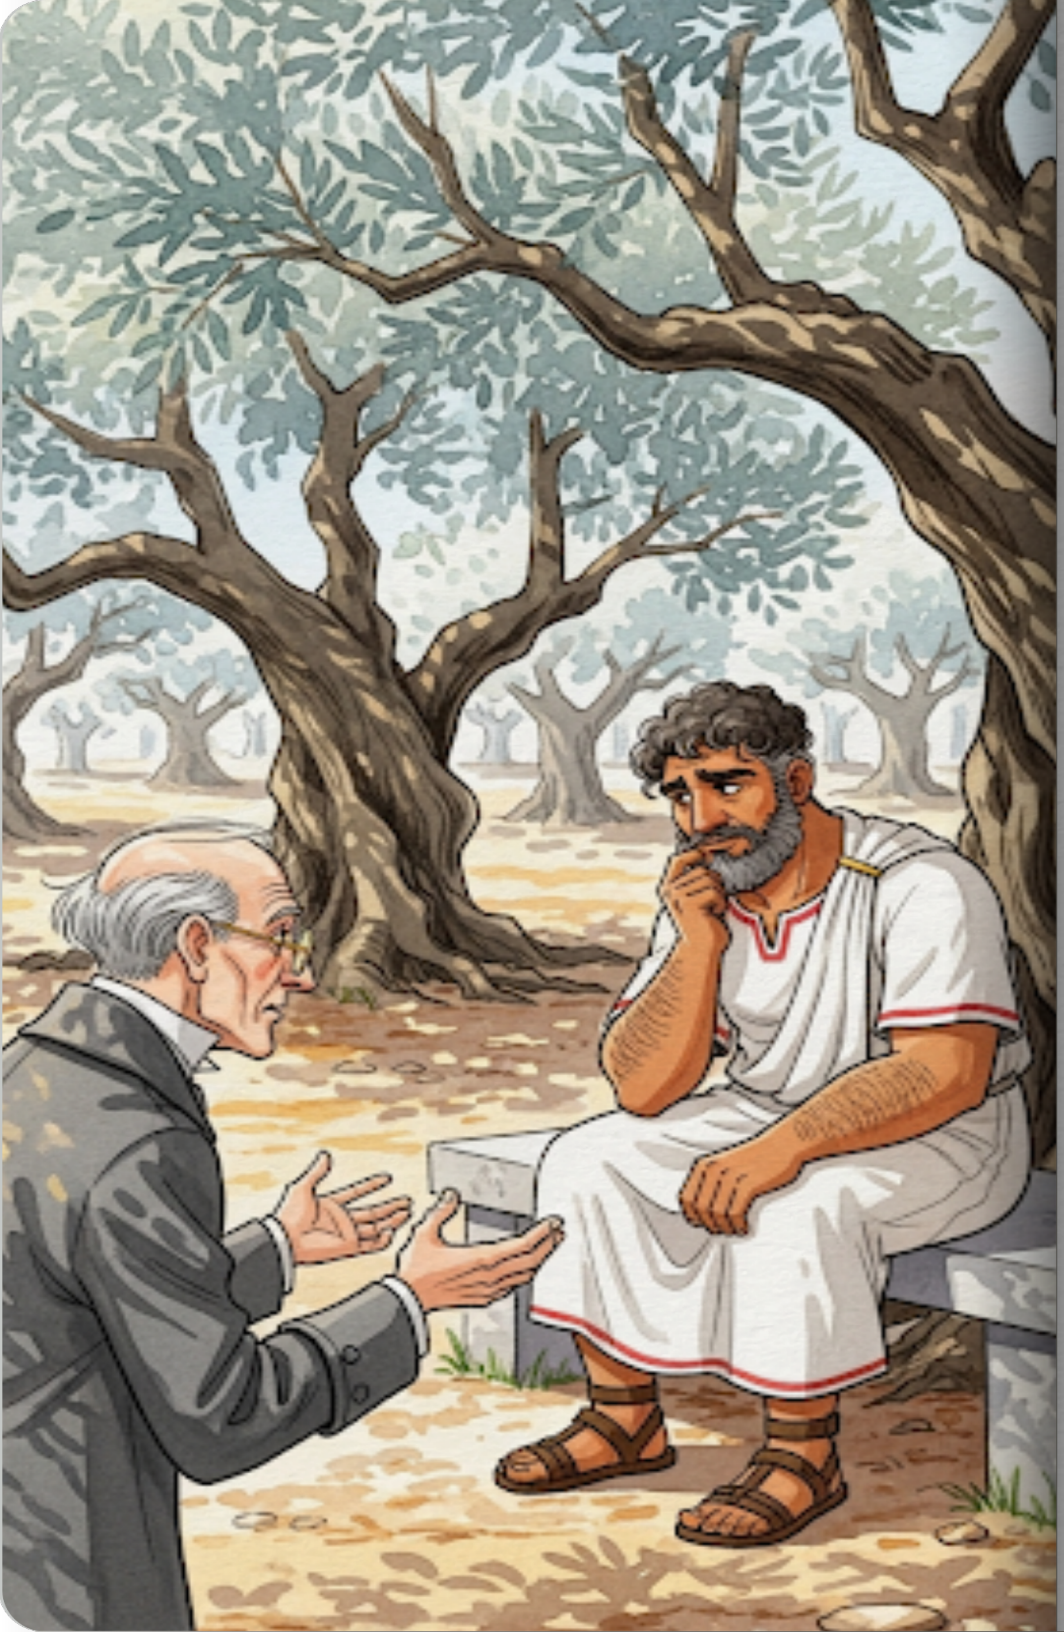
The Weight of a Good Deed

De Helder Araújo

In the quiet, drafty town of Königsberg, a man named Immanuel paced his study. His mind was a clockwork of logic and rules. "It is not the consequence that matters!" he declared to his inkwell. "It is the will behind the act! Duty is the only true north." Suddenly, the air shimmered like heat over a summer road, and a tiny, glowing figure appeared among his stacks of parchment.

The fairy, whose name was Flux, fluttered her wings with a sound like turning pages. "You seek the origin of virtue, Immanuel?" she chirped. "Perhaps you belong in a time when logic was young." With a flick of her wrist, the grey walls of the study dissolved into salt spray and sunlight. Immanuel found himself standing on a sun-drenched hill, his heavy wool coat feeling very out of place against the marble columns of the Parthenon.

A man in a simple white chiton approached him, stroking a thoughtful beard. This was Aris, the wisest teacher in the city. "You look like a man burdened by many thoughts," Aris said, offering a hand. Immanuel adjusted his spectacles. "I am a man who believes that the categorical imperative is the only path to moral truth," he replied. Aris smiled, intrigued. "Tell me of these 'acts' you prize so highly."



For hours, they walked beneath the silver leaves of the olive trees. Immanuel explained that a good act is one done out of pure duty, regardless of what happens next. Aris nodded slowly. "I have long taught that virtue is an activity of the soul," Aris agreed. "To act with reason is to fulfill our highest purpose. You speak a truth that resonates with the golden mean."

Immanuel felt a swell of pride. He had come to the cradle of philosophy and found that even the great Aris bowed to his logic. He walked through the marketplace with his head held high, looking down at the merchants and the poets. "I have perfected the ancient wisdom," he whispered to himself. "I am the master of the moral law, superior even to those who laid its foundations."

Flux appeared again, perched on the head of a headless statue. She didn't look impressed by Immanuel’s vanity. "You've convinced the past, Immanuel, but you've forgotten the future," she said, her voice like a silver bell. "Intent is the seed, but the world must eat the fruit. A 'good' act that leaves the world in tears is a puzzle with a missing piece."

Flux reached into a pocket of air and pulled out a man wearing a tidy suit from a much later century. He had a gentle face and eyes that seemed to count every grain of sand. "This is Stuart," Flux announced. Stuart blinked at the Greek sun and then at the two philosophers. "I was told there was a debate about what makes an act truly good," Stuart said calmly.

Aris joined them, and Stuart began to speak. "It is not enough for an act to be logical or dutiful," Stuart explained, looking at Aris. "A truly good act is one that increases the sum of happiness and diminishes the sum of pain. We must look at the harvest, not just the sower. The greatest good for the greatest number—that is the measure of a man."

Aris sat on a fallen column, staring at his sandals in shame. "We were so busy defining the soul that we forgot the neighbor," he sighed. Immanuel sat beside him, the great Prussian and the great Greek both humbled by the man from the future. "It seems," Immanuel muttered, "that we are all just beginning to learn." Flux smiled and began to weave the light to take them home.